As the UN's Sustainable Development Goals addressed, we face serious, complex social issues. We have to change the paradigm to make our planet sustainable and pursue the “no-one-left-behind” society. Even though Japan is known as an economically-developed country, we work on many challenges including aging, declining birthrates, child poverty, natural disaster, and immigration policy change.

However, we have observed some positive changes and outcomes in our society since our organization established in 2008. An ecosystem which supports nonprofit organizations and social entrepreneurs has developed. In details, a policy of tax deduction for charitable organizations was modified. Moreover, a crowdfunding system has developed so much and now becomes a big market to support Japanese charitable activities. Also, some celebrities and business leaders are contributing to solving social issues, which makes positive vibes to accelerate fundraising culture.

While these positive changes definitely underpin our daily businesses and practices, we have to move the needle. In order to do that, each individual takes social issues seriously and then take a role and actions to support people struggling with adversity.

Fundraising is to have people acknowledge what happens in our society and provide solutions. In this process, fundraisers do inspire and involve with people for making a better world together. I believe fundraising has an indispensable commitment to solving social issues and would like to address the possibility of fundraising as a key strategy for social change.

We look forward to seeing all of you in FRJ 2019 and discussing the power and possibility of fundraising.

Sincerely,

Masataka Uo
Founder and CEO of Japan Fundraising Association
